NEW YORK POSTAL SERVICE.

What Has Been Done and Is Being Done in the New York Post Office-A Plea For the Overworked Post Office

Clerks. In view of the early completion of the new Post Mce, which Mr. Supervising Architect Mullett promises to have ready for occupancy early this fall, the business of administering the United States mail service is carried on at the old office quietly and without ostentation. It is now fourapon the Postmastership of this city. The first request made by him of Postmaster General Cressall was an increase in the force of carriers. Mr. ames gave such lucid reasons to back his appeal that General Cresswell authorized him to appoint sixty-five additional men, which he did, after subecting the applicants to a rigid civil service ex-

Mr. James next availed himself of every method offered for rapid transit in transporting mails to d from the various stations by utilizing the New York Elevated Railway and the city railroads. Twelve deliveries are thus made daily, and as many collections had from the lamppost boxes. The only complaint offered by the Postmaster is that his carrier and station force is inadequate to accommodate the rapidly increasing demands of the city to keep up with the immense influx of mail matter which has to pass through the New York office.

accommodate the rapidly increasing demands of the city to keep up with the immense influx of mail matter which has to pass through the New York office.

Recognizing this fact Mr. James instructed Mr. James Gayler, his General Superintendent of City Delivery, to make a thorough investigation into the different stations and report on the condition of the service and suggest such reforms as his judgment and experience dictated. In a long and elaborate report Mr. Gayler sets forth that "there is urgent necessity for the employment of additional cierks at most of the stations of this office. The system established by you (the Postmaster) of hourly transportation of mails by messengers on street cars on the upper circuit and by the Elevated Railway, has resulted in a marked improvement in the delivery service by greatly factilitating the interchange of local correspondence between the stations and their communication with the general office. But this increase in the efficiency of the service has involved a corresponding increase in the duties and responsibilities of the clerks at the stations, whose ousiness it is to see that the carriers are promptly and property supplied with their mail matter for delivery, the collections assorted, the mails for other stations, the general office and railway post office cars made up and despatched and the public supplied with postage stamps and money orders, and nirmished with the facilities for the registration of letters. At each departure of a mail wagon or messenger from a station, mails for the other stations and for the general office are required to be made up separately, labelled and pouched, ready for despatch, while the work of assorting the arriving mails, the rate of stamps, the registration of letters and the issue of money orders must continue without interruption.

"When the clerical force is insufficient, the assorting the arriving mails, the rate of stamps, the registration of letters and the issue of money orders must continue without interruption.

"When the cle

Since 1870 there have been but fourteen additional clerks assigned to duty at the ten principal stations, exclusive of money order cierks, although the business there transacted has increased in the ratio shown by the following figures:—

Letters delivered in Delivered January, 1870. January, 1870. January, 1874. 256,132 561,130 185,344 256,849 194,709 505,547 194,709 505,547 194,709 505,547 195,106

and L one each. Mr. James has transmitted this report to the Postmaster General, requesting authority to in-crease said force as recommended, and, as Mr. James says, that for the effected reforms and extra facilities adopted in the city delivery service the public is indebted in no smail degree to Post-master General Cresswell, there is every reason to hope that the latter will at once authorize the in-crease in the cierical force of the above-pamed stations. Postmaster General Cresswell, at the first interview with Postmaster James, told him to "go ahead and he could lean on him at all times."

In the registration business of the New York Post Office the reduction of the registry fee from fifteen cenus to eight cents on all registered letters has resulted in increasing the number of letters has resulted in increasing the number of letters registered to an extent not at all anticipated when the change went into operation. The increase for the month of May, 1874, is just thirty-five per cent over the business of May, 1873. The clerical force in the Registry Department is seeing the hardest sort of work, but "siack times" are looked for with the advance of the summer months.

It is astonishing how careless people are in not prepaying their letters, which necessarily go to the Dead Letter Office, owing to the absence of stamps on their correspondence. On an average Mr. James has 150 of these missives handed to him daily for retention from this cause, some of them bearing a check instead of a postage stamp. Whenever any address is recognized among these "held for postage" letters Mr. James affixes the necessary stamp and forwards the letter.
